Writing & Review

　　　　Our days are filled with mass media and texting, and it all happens in an instant, even across the world. The Internet and the easy ways we see and speak with people have expanded more recently, and will likely continue to grow. Communication is not just a phone call any longer. The basic tools are still reading and writing. That's all that is needed for making much of the content. What's remarkable is that even those skills are changing.

　　　　Writing is an acquired skill. When we write a story, we usually start with a subject. We work with a few sentences and steadily review our writing. Usually, we have a topic we want to express. In addition, we also add supporting material we want to use to help us back up the main topic. This is the way we make a clear story when we want to write about a subject. As we rely more on modern technology, changes are now being used to write and speed up written production.

　　　　Recently, artificial intelligence (AI)[1] software has been used for written communication. Some essential writing skills may not be needed to have an exciting and sensible story. To begin with, a very detailed topic sentence or well-thought out title is the initial starting point. From that original title, the software can quickly produce an ambitious and interesting story in only a few minutes. It doesn't really need to be a person, because the computer assistant will do really well.

　　　　So while this may be helpful and less work, it does make you doubtful. Is this the best use of a computer? Also, this is possible, will this change how people work and their jobs in the future? We will continue to move forward, but AI writing is more useful for news which is more specific to fine details. Sports scores and financial information are much more suitable to this type of news writing. We do need to be flexible with change. So when we hear news of self-driving[2] cars, unmanned[3] trains, and robotic[4] conveniences, we know these AI tools will be in our future as well. The use of computers will continue to expand while automating[5] many more jobs, and new jobs with safeguards[6] will be part of that future as well.
